Not illustrated. 1908 Excerpt: .acid attacks the enamel of the tooth, with the result that the lime is dissolved out, and the enamel tissue broken down. Directly this happens the dentine is attacked, the lime of the softer dentine is dissolved out, and fresh bacteria invade the dentine tubes. These peptonise or digest the gelatine after the lime is removed, thus forming a cavity, a process accompanied with more or less pain. If at this stage the tooth is treated--the softened tissue removed, with the bacteria, and a suitable filling inserted--it may be saved for years of useful work. If the tooth is left untreated, the bacteria continue their destructive operations until the pulp chamber is reached. The nerve is then exposed, with more or less acute pain, and the contents of the pulp chamber--nerve and blood-vessels--are gradually destroyed; and, by their decomposition, putrefactive material with bacteria accumulates in the centre of the tooth, and extends to the apex of the root. Sooner or later some of this septic material finds its way into the jaw--septic infection; the result is an abscess, with loss of the tooth, and occasionally the death of the patient by septic poisoning. The effects of dental caries are far-reaching: it prevents efficient mastication--one of the most important functions of the human body; it spoils the food and promotes various digestive disorders; the nervous system is constantly irritated by pulp exposure; the blood is poisoned by the introduction of septic material, either through the jaws or...
