Within all was fragrance and beauty; the perfumes of the tube rose, the heliotrope and the Azorean jessamine, floated on the air; and the fine form of the lady of the bower, exquisitely attired, was stretched in luxurious grace on the down pillows of a silken couch, half concealed by the drooping branches of a taschion, which hung its pendent copal blossoms over a marble basin. The soft light of alabaster lamps, (matching well with the silvery moonshine which entered from without,) illumined the scene; and an artist would have gone far to contemplate such a picture. But the coveted novel was speedily flung aside, and a sprig of blossomed myrtle, which had succeeded to the demolished carnation, was, like that, twisted about the fair fingers, and then thrown peevishly away: the perfect face was more than ever clouded; and when the tender husband repeated his kind question, -- What ails my Caroline 1 the peevish beauty exclaimed, That gnat! Exactly ten years afterwards, on just such an Augnst evening, a plain and plainly dressed lady, whose features were strongly marked with that now rarely met disfigurer of the female countenance, the small-pox, but whose face, in spite of this great disadvantage, was still pleasing, from its sweet, yet animated expression, was sitting with her husband in this very Conserva tory, listening to two fine children, a...
